of Anchal in Kollam, seeking police protection against trade union workers demanding 'nokkukooli'.

Nokkukooli, loosely translated from Malayalam as 'gawking wages,' is the practice of trade unions in Kerala to demand payment for work they have not done. Head-load workers, who prevent loading or unloading of goods if they are not obliged, generally engage in nokkukooli. Nokkukooli reached the level of extortion during the 80s and 90s, the heyday of trade union militancy, but subsided thereafter.

During the hearing, the court said, "It's not enough to claim that Kerala is an investment-friendly state, we have to live up to it. Why is the government not initiating action against trade unions taking the law into their hands? I don't understand the hesitation. If this goes on, no one will be ready to invest in the state."

The court also referred to the issue over demand for 'nokkukooli' by union workers with regard to ISRO's heavy goods at Thiruvananthapuram and said such incidents result in humiliation for the state. Despite bringing in a ban on 'nokkukooli' a decade ago, it has not been implemented yet, the court pointed out. The court also added that the fear among people to invest in Kerala is the primary reason for fewer employment opportunities in the state.

Teacher moves HC against police 'excesses'

Kolkata: Calcutta High Court on Friday allowed a schoolteacher and candidate from Mathurapur to file a petition on alleged police "overdrive" against him, reports Subrata Chatteraj.

Maidul had moved HC, complaining that 200 cops "raided and vandalised" his Mathurapur home. Advocate general Kishore Dutta told court that Maidul was an accused in an attempt to murder case and there was need to take him into custody for questioning.

Justice Rajasekhara Mantha posted the hearing on Tuesday and said the petitioner could approach court in an exigency before that date.
